Roberto Pires, Researcher at the Institute for Applied Economic Research (IPEA) / Department for State, Institutions and Democracy Studies, based in Brasilia, Brazil.

I received my PhD in Public Policy and Development from the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (2009), M.A. in Political Science from the Federal University of Minas Gerais (2005), and B.A. in Public Administration from João Pinheiro Foundation (2001). Since 2009, I work as a researcher at the Institute for Applied Economic Research (IPEA), a think-tank linked to the federal government of Brazil. Prior to that I also served for the Secretariat of Planning in the government of Minas Gerais State. My research experience and interests center on public sector bureaucracies, policy implementation, and state-society relations. I have conducted research on participatory institutions in Brazil, both at the local and federal levels, focusing on their effects on policymaking. More recently, my research projects are focusing on the analysis of an emergence democratic developmental state in Brazil
